VOLUME LXXXVI — JULY 1964 — PRICE $1.00 — NUMBER SEVEN

It's a Long Way from One Committee

ONE DAY LAST WEEK my ten-year old daughter and I were looking for a magazine stand in an enormous shopping center, a mercantile village, built on what had been piney flats where I used to gallop rented horses. I was telling my daughter how different such a shopping center was from anything conceived in the world of my childhood, when she asked me what exactly was "the space age" she heard so much about. How was it different from other times?

Fumblingly I told her I thought it was simply a handy and rather false name given to a period that was becoming "a mass society" as opposed to the former society of individuals. Buildings, for instance, had less individuality just as people were cut more from a single pattern—"cut-outs," as we used to call types. As thoughts and ideas became stereotyped, persons came under group controls. But the men-in-space program did not characterize the life of the average person. As Lewis Mumford said in a book review in the New Yorker, putting a man on the moon had the same rational futility as the technical masterpieces the Pharoahs built in the pyramids: that is, nothing was contributed to the well-being or serviceable knowledge of the civilization.

Whether or not such a glib generalization could stand up against arguments, some of the points are not open to question. As an illustration of group controls, a glance at the departments and divisions required to operate the one state of Virginia will immediately suggest the enormity and complexity of what has accurately come to be called "the machinery of government." These exist in a state whose principle is to supply the needs of its citizens and not to invent operations that create wants.

This proliferation of operating controls does not in any sense indicate that Virginians have become more helpless, or less reliant, though unquestionably the trend of the national government is to promote dependence in its citizens. In Virginia the vast growth of government indicates the extent to which the state's resources—human as well as physical—have of necessity been placed under controls for the welfare of the total community. While many of the operational agencies represent areas of activity that were not

CONTENTS

VIRGINIA RECORD takes pride in presenting this, its First Annual Directory of Virginia State, City and County Officials.

Prime original source of information was the Report of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, corrected through April 1, 1964. Additionally, by using hundreds of letters and making innumerable phone calls to cities and towns throughout the state, in view of the June municipal elections, the list of municipal officials was brought up to date through June 30. Nevertheless, despite every effort having been made to ensure currency and accuracy, some errors or omissions may have occurred. Should you detect any, please let us know.

The pictorial selections include those persons named in the OFFICERS OF THE STATE GOVERNMENT section in the Report of the Secretary of the Commonwealth and Virginia's congressional delegation.

Your suggestions and comments for future editions of the Directory will be appreciated.

No pavement could be stronger even if carved from solid rock!

Interstate highways of new-type concrete give the smoothest ride ever. Laid flat, concrete stays flat.

Interstate highways, with their new-type concrete, show how to end traffic jams Roads built for old-style traffic had narrow lanes. There were plenty of blind curves. In hilly country you would sometimes see cars backed up for a mile or more. Trips took far longer than they should.

On new Interstate highways—with wide lanes, clear view ahead and no crossroads—traffic jams promise to disappear, accidents to diminish strikingly.

And new-type concrete adds extra safety and comfort. You can count on concrete's grainy, light-colored surface for dependable skid resistance, high night visibility—plus the smoothest ride there is.

Furthermore, concrete keeps these advantages because it's man-made rock—strongest paving material known. Engineers can actually design highways of new-type concrete to last 50 years and more. Upkeep costs run as much as 60% lower than for asphalt. So every way you look at it, concrete is the preferred pavement for the new Interstate System.

It's A Long Way

in existence in earlier times—not even dreamed of—many others represent a more enlightened attitude toward the human and physical resources.

If at Jamestown, for instance, the Mosquito Control Districts had been in operation, countless lives would have been spared and incalculable sources of energy saved from debilitating effects of the vicious insects. Though the Indians apparently seemed impervious to the mosquitoes, neither the settlers nor their descendants (350 years later) developed any immunity, and probably many an Indian slunk close to some settler whose attention was concentrated on a mosquito bite.

The health departments would unquestionably have lowered the high mortality rates of the early years in Virginia, and Soil Conservation would have rendered unnecessary the constant grabbing of new lands. In fact, had the early small planters learned how to prevent tobacco from ruining the soil in about five years, the whole course of Colonial Virginia history would be changed. The Colony, and later the state, would not have lost by the heavy drain on its independent, self-reliant stock of farmer or small planter (the foundation blocks in Jefferson's democracy), who migrated out of the state because the continent's first land-barons had gobbled up all the good land.

The state would certainly have benefitted in the decades before the Civil War by an Industrial Commission and a Department of Conservation and Economic Development. While some plantations and many farms, especially in the Valley, held their own in agricultural productivity with the progressive farming then in the Midwest, as a whole the state relied disproportionately on agriculture under conditions where much land was farmed by obsolete, wasteful methods.

Public Instruction would also have been a boon to pre-Civil War Virginia, which supported no public school system as we understand it today and where—it must be said—no great stress was placed on general education. Education was largely for the sons of privilege and, while highly motivated men of ambition educated themselves (like Henry Clay, who then left the state for the greener pastures of Kentucky), little attention was given to the development of the minds of women (though some individuals developed extremely cultivated minds at home).

The Library, of course, represents the awareness of the need to make knowledge generally available, as does the Museum in art. The Parks derived from a nineteenth century development that approximated the picnic "groves" outside of towns and villages, and even cities, and the old country churchyards.

With the State Highway Department comes the area of activities that could not have been foreseen in Colonial times, though even then life would have offered one less hazard to human welfare by an improvement of the roads for carriages, wagons and buggies. But the concept of the modern highway grew basically for the accommodation of automotive vehicles, with all the implied change in increase of travel and increase of speed of travel—in which some drivers evidently have been sold on the "space age" idea. The parallel Division of Motor Vehicles is strictly an operation caused by the changed technology of our times.

The Virginia Alcoholic Beverage Control Board represents a new concept for activities that existed in Biblical times. Economically the operation provides revenues for the state, which can be diverted into the supply of other needs, and in attitude it represents the new idea of state control of an individual's habits and choices. In this, though the reasons for it would scarcely be attributed to avant garde thinking, Virginia is very advanced in the national tendency toward reducing its citizens to robots of the state by removing from them the right of personal decision and the responsibility for their own acts.

But, over its whole broad scope, the government operations of the state have tended to preserve the individual rights of its citizens in a mass society. It follows the general trend of partly paternalistic humanism with its departments that provide for aspects of the care of its citizens—Employment, Retirement, Workmen's Compensation, Aging, etc.—without in any sense setting up a "Welfare State."

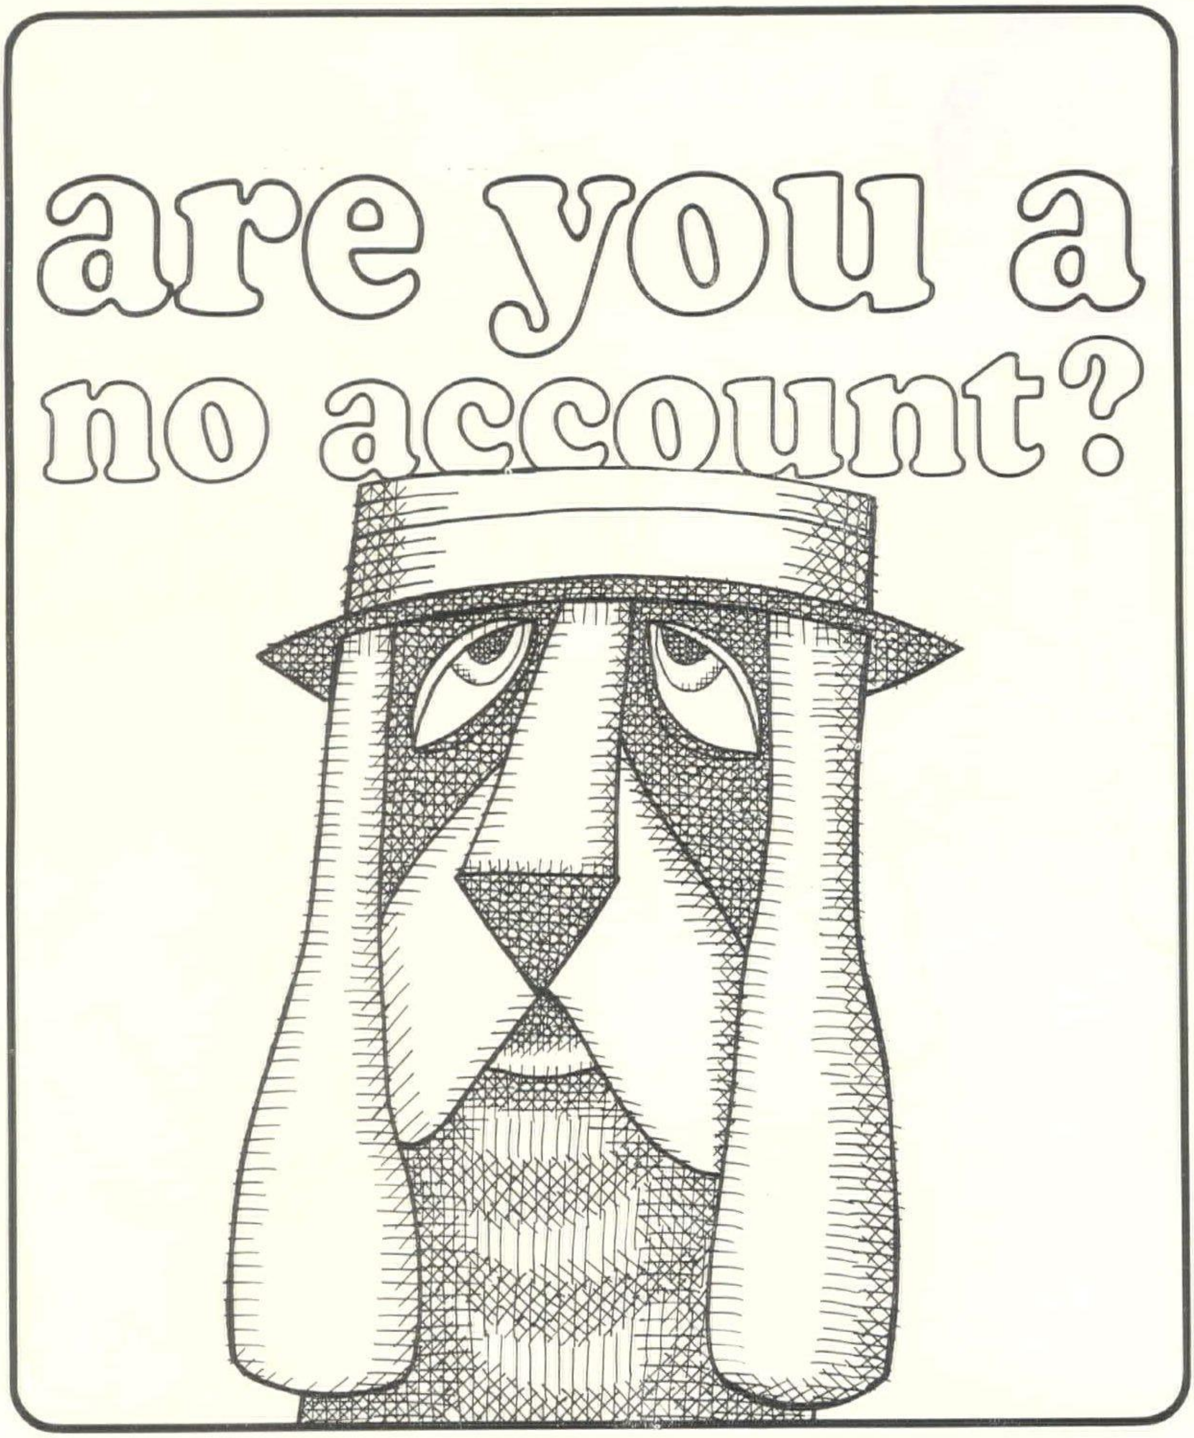

As the population continues to grow, new needs will appear, and the departments must continue to grow, until—if Western civilization survives—some system will evolve that will be as different from all known to us as ours is from Jamestown which (without mosquito control) bravely faced the unknown future with one committee.
